Count Orloff, Count Woronzo, Davon Nicholai, Colonei Fenshaw, and a number of Russian gentlemen who remain in England, attended to take a facewel of their Emperor, and they enbraced according to the custom of their country. No person was admitted into the Harel on Wednesday morning as a spectator. The Emperor, the Grand Duchess, the Duke of Oldenburgh, and the Prince of Wirtemberg, cutted an open earriage of the Pince Regent, exactly as the clock struck nine. As they were extering the caningre, a women presented abook to the Emperor, which he headed to a page on the step; another woman presented thin with a very fine rose, which the Emperor gave to the Grand Duchess, and she placed it in her bosom. The carriage then force off midst the loud huzzas of the populace. The carriage drove to the Tower of London, and afterwards, we understand, to other places, and presed along London bridge, at half-past twelve o'clock, on, their way to the seat of the Earl of Liverpool, at Combe Wood, to breekfast. A man was sationed on horseback on the top of the hill at Kingston, to conduct them to the house of Noble Earl, from thence they were to proceed to Portsmouth.

The King of Pressia, followed by the Princes, left Clarence House at half-past nine o'clock, in a Royal carriage, for the Earl of Liverpool's seat.
