An ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF ROBERT BLOOMFIELD,
Author of "The Farmer's Boy," &c. &c.

— Packadope lis decome morte queet.

Is Bloomfield dead?—the best, the mildest man,
That aver rode on life's rough stormy wave;
Is be, who could so truly mature scan.
Now alumb ring in the silence of the grave?

Alna's poor Glies! and are thy harp-strings broke?
And will thy rastic lyre no more the ear?

And will thy rastic lyre no more the ear?

And will thy rastic lyre no more the ear?

It is the poor the property of the property hearties lend,
Has dropp'd for ever from its master's hand.

The lofticis here who e'er shock the world—
The product monarch, and the lowest hind—
Alike by deads are from their stations hard, and the best all manified?

The good, the bad, all moulder in the grave;
From dust they came, to dust they must retsome few there are whom memory will save,
When lost the sculptur'd monumental urn.

When lost the sculptur'd monumental urn.

Of tiese, lanenced Bloomfield, bloo art one;

While nature gives delight thy name will live;

Thy page a lexing centough has ween,

Which an admiring world will freely give.

Suffer a minarch humble and unknown,

His surless tribute of respect to pay.

The 'thy tomb's stery'd wiln respect to pay.

The 'thy tomb's stery'd wiln respect to pay.

And the world wiln are will be a stery of wiln respect to pay.

And the world wiln are will be a stery of wiln respect to pay.
