Tis ead to think when morning is smiling fresh and young, With her robe of rosy fringes So lightly round her flung;

That clouds may soon enfold her Like the sable robes of night, And gloom may shroud the infant Now laughing in her light.

But the sable cloud that veileth Her beauty from the view, Shall melt in drops as pearly As the brightest summer dew.

And each drop that gems the rose bud Or seeks a softer flower. Shall reflect the living beauty Of the mild and sunny hour.

And the lightly bounding bosom, And the songsters from the thorn. Shall tell of sweets untasted, on A cloudless summer morn.

Like the stream of purer feeling That illumes the youthful heart, When joy in radiance beaming Bids the sadnes, there, depart.

The sky would lose its beauty
If the sun was ever there,
And youth would cease to charm us
If the check was ever fair.

So seek not changeless brightness
Or flower of fadeless bloom.
Till you reach a land of beauty
Thro' the portals of the tomb.

TO A LADY WITH A WATCH. Oft as the silent-moving hands
Around the figured dial wheel,
Amid the joys and cares of life,
Oh! may one thought thy brothes

And when, beneath thy pillow'd bend, This toy shall keep its midnight meas Think that one heart as constant beats, To shield from harm its chiefest treat

As long, dear girl, as Heaven ordains
Thy days and mine together flow,
This hand shall never cease to twine
A wreath of joy to deck thy brow.

And when the Fates their threads shall spin To that said point where we must sever, Their doom, perhaps, may make me leave My sister—but forget her never!
